Clamore

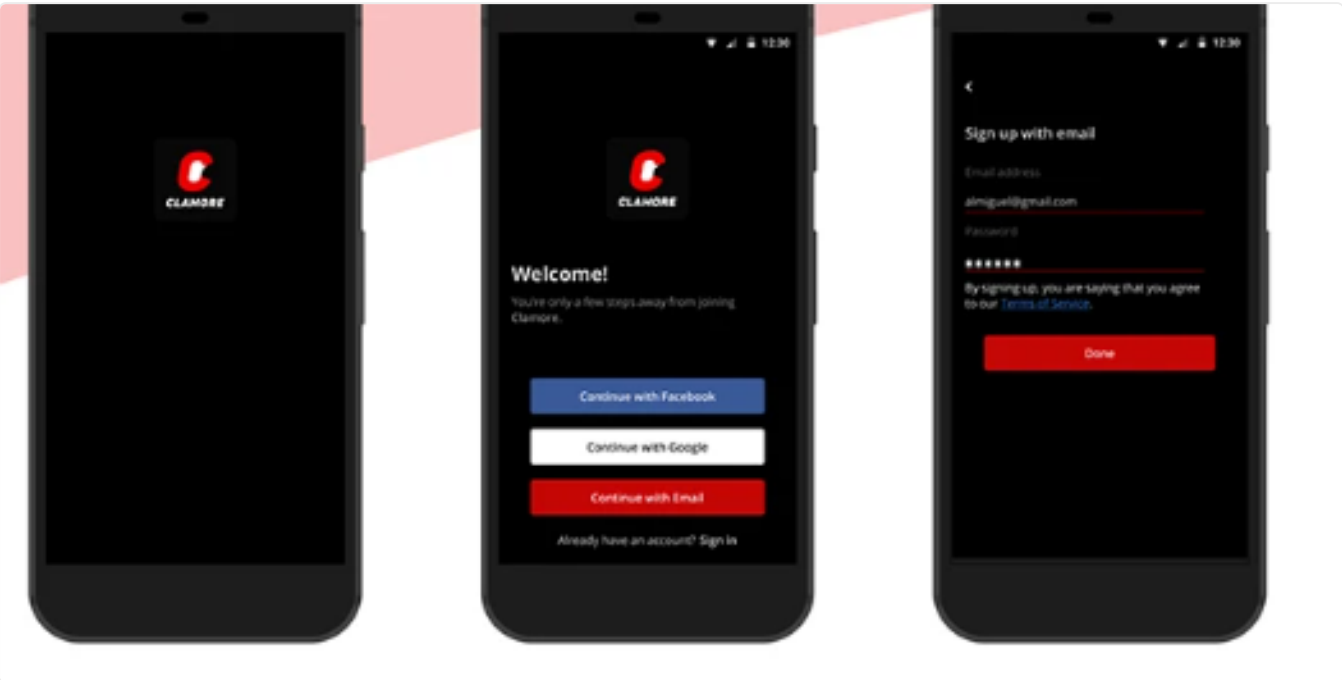

A Movie Review App · UX & Product Design Case Study

Motolani Deborah Akinyemi · Designed 2020

> A quick note before you scroll. Clamore is one of my earliest projects, born back in 2020 out of a 10-day design challenge. I have come back to it recently and cleaned up a few details, but I have kept the heart of it exactly as it was. This was one of those projects that kept me at the edge of my seat the whole way through. Sleepless nights, interesting collaborations, and more coffee than I would like to admit. I still look back on it fondly.

Overview

Clamore is both a social network for film lovers and a movie review platform. I embarked on the journey of designing Clamore in response to a 10-day design challenge, and I was able to complete the design within the ten days.

Splash, welcome, and sign-up screens

Deliverables

The design challenge came with a few deliverables as part of the requirements. I had limited time to work with, so I stuck with delivering just those. The deliverables for Clamore were:

- Competitive analysis

- Branding
- Wireframes

Competitive Analysis

Competitive analysis is usually the first part of my design process. Normally, I would conduct a simple survey in order to know what my users need and do not need, then fold my competitive research questions into that survey. In designing Clamore, I decided to head straight to competitive research so as not to delay. I carried out my research on three applications, using feedback, both critical and positive, from the Google Play Store: IMDb, Showmax, and Letterboxd. My findings were as follows:

App	Strengths	Weaknesses	Design	User experience
IMDb	Provides the movie information users need, keeps them updated on new releases, lets members rate films and find highly rated ones	Too many ads, takes too long to load, intrusive notifications	Cluttered, which makes it hard for users to decide what to do next	Generally good
Showmax	Lets users stream major movies and shows, consumes less data	Too many glitches, downloading takes too long, no dark theme	Absence of a dark theme	Not very good, mostly due to glitches
Letterboxd	Makes it easy to track films watched and a watchlist, social features let users discuss movies, easy to navigate	Crashes frequently, does not save progress	Neat and organised, based on user reviews	Undermined by excessive ads and bugs

Branding

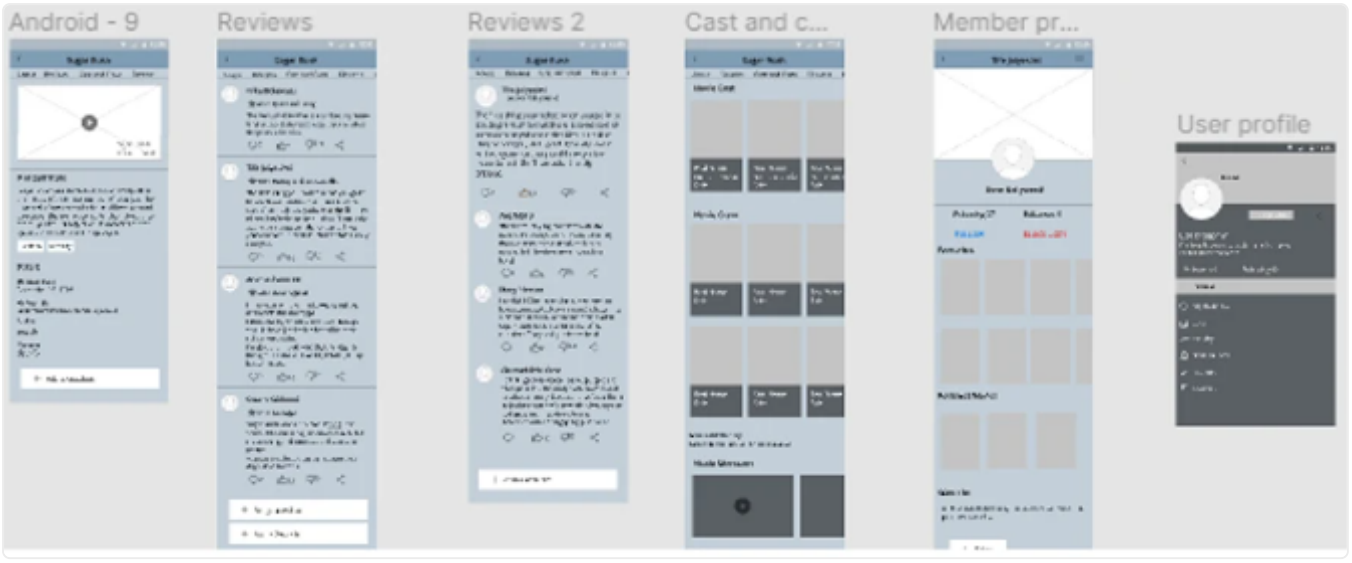

The logo uses design features to shape the right associations while avoiding obvious symbolism. The crimson is used in association with the usual red cinema chairs. The black is symbolic of the quiet darkness that lets viewers feel a level of cool-headedness and calm while watching movies. The plus side of the dark color is that it also makes movie covers pop and appear even more attractive than they already are.

The logo, while it might in a way imitate the Netflix logo, is quite unique to Clamore, as it also carries the idea of the social aspect in the app. The most interesting part of the brand choice is that I got to team up on it. I learnt to work as a team and get another person's perspective on the design. Collaborating was a huge part of this process, and one I really enjoyed. The logo was designed with my partner, Emmanuel Fadugba.

Background color: #000000

Wireframes

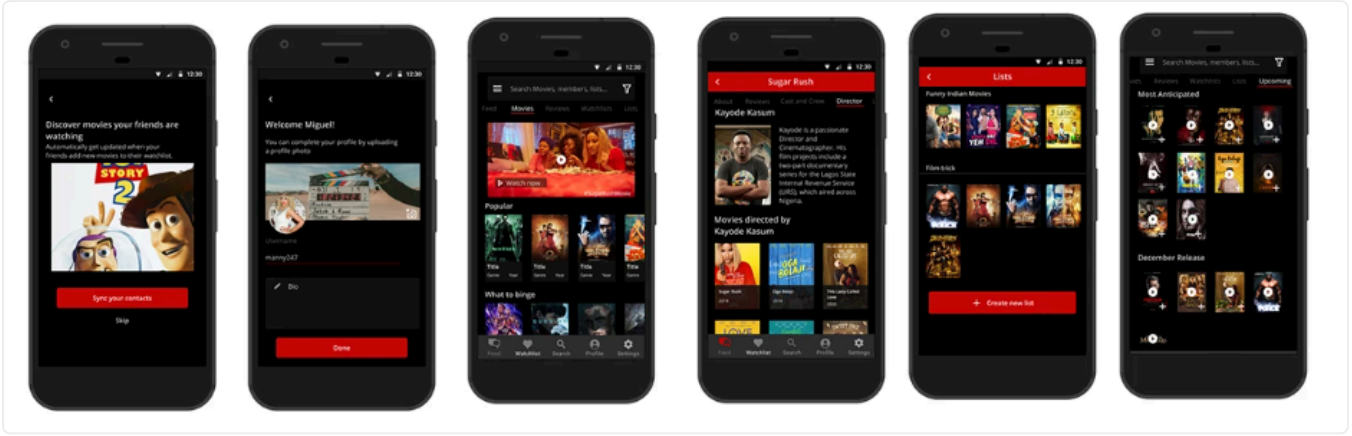

When I started learning design, I honestly felt like I could go straight into high-fidelity designs, as long as I could envision the idea in my head. I learnt the hard way, on a project with no sketches or wireframes, where I simply lost a lot of time staring at my screen for hours. So for Clamore, I started with the structure first. Below are a few of the wireframes I made.

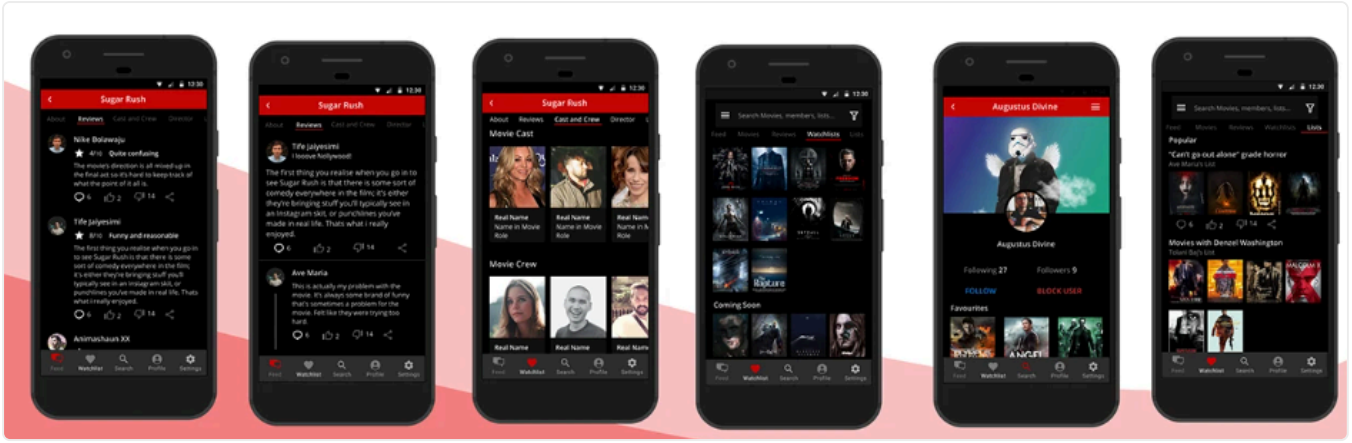

Low-fidelity wireframes: reviews, cast and crew, member profile, user profile

High Fidelity

Now, for my last trick, I will show you some of my favourite Clamore screens, in no particular order, straight from Figma. Maybe they will convince you to work with me.

Onboarding, home feed, movie detail, reviews, cast and crew, lists, and profile screens

---

I am not perfect, but I learn and upgrade myself every day. Clamore will always have a soft spot in my heart, and I am proud of what I built in just ten days.

Thank you for scrolling to the end. Motolani Deborah Akinyemi